

A TRIP BOOK

San Francisco, California

TAP NEXT TO BEGIN

Golden Gate Bridge

The bridge's International Orange towers rising against a clear blue sky, suspension cables fanning down to the roadway, sailboats dotting the bay below and wild lupine blooming in the foreground.

The bridge's signature International Orange was originally just a sealant primer color, but the consulting architect liked it so much against the bay's blue water and green hills that it became permanent.

Lombard Street

Looking down Lombard Street's famous switchbacks, red brick paving lined with hydrangeas, the bay and Coit Tower visible in the distance beyond the rooftops.

The crooked one-block section of Lombard Street was built in 1922 with eight hairpin turns to make the hill's original 27% grade manageable for cars.

Painted Ladies

A row of Victorian houses on Steiner Street, each painted in a different palette, with San Francisco's downtown skyline rising behind them across Alamo Square.

This row is nicknamed "Postcard Row." The houses were built in the 1890s in Queen Anne style and are some of the most photographed homes in the city.

Fisherman's Wharf

A giant ship's-wheel sign marking Fisherman's Wharf, a Dungeness crab at its center, with crowds crossing the street toward the seafood restaurants beyond.

Fisherman's Wharf has been a working harbor since Genoese immigrant fishermen settled the area in the mid-1800s, and Dungeness crab is still its signature catch each winter.

Alcatraz Island

Alcatraz Island seen from the water, its water tower, cellhouse, and lighthouse standing above the rocky bluff, with the ruins of the warden's house off to the side.

The island's lighthouse, built in 1854, was the first operating lighthouse on the U.S. West Coast — decades before the federal prison opened there in 1934.

Powell & Hyde Cable Car

A miniature enameled cable car keychain marked "Powell & Hyde Sts." and "Cable Car 39," paired with a small San Francisco charm shaped like the Golden Gate Bridge.

The Powell-Hyde line is one of only three cable car lines left in the world still running on cable. It's also the steepest, climbing over Russian Hill before ending near Fisherman's Wharf.

The End

Golden Gate Bridge · Lombard Street · Painted Ladies · Fisherman's Wharf · Alcatraz Island ·
Powell & Hyde Cable Car

Until the next adventure.

